

Cyberlux: Inactive, Inflated, and In Over Its Head

Description

Cyberlux Corporation, and its online pump squad, continues to strut like itâ??s just won a billion-dollar defense contract, when in reality, it canâ??t even get through the front door. Their SAM registration expired back in January 2025. Thatâ??s not just a missing formâ??itâ??s a full-stop disqualification. No registration means no bidding, no contracts, no late-night PowerPoints to the Pentagon. Nothing. And yet, somehow, theyâ??re still parading around like national security depends on them.

Just last week, they tried to puff themselves up again, this time name-dropping Palantir. The announcement sounded impressive, until you read it. Thereâ??s no partnership. No contract. No collaboration. Just Cyberlux saying it would like to spend money on software, assuming it had any. Itâ??s like someone broke, mid-divorce, and mid-lawsuit announcing plans to buy a Ferrari because they clicked â??Iâ??m Interestedâ?• on the website.

And while all of this is going on, social media remains loud with unsupported optimism, repeating the companyâ??s talking points as if repetition alone will make them real. Whether itâ??s loyal shareholders or those closer to the inside isnâ??t always clearâ??but the narrative is consistent, and itâ??s detached from the facts.

Meanwhile, back in the real world, Cyberlux is bleeding from every legal orifice. They've lost court cases, skipped out on settlements, and quietly moved money to insiders like it's Monopoly night. Their financials aren't even smoke and mirrors anymore—they're just smoke. The filings aren't misleading; they're performance art.

Let's be clear: Cyberlux is not getting federal contracts. Not tomorrow. Not next quarter. Not ever, unless the laws change or someone at DoD starts handing out deals like raffle tickets. The company is under legal siege, operating without basic compliance, and propped up by an echo chamber of compensated confidence.

Anyone watching this and thinking "this might turn around" needs a cold glass of reality. Cyberlux's story isn't a comeback arc. It's a documentary about what happens when fantasy replaces fundamentals. No registration. No accountability. No deal.
