

Cyberlux Under Fire: Court Defeats and Legal Silence Fuel Corporate Trouble

Description

Cyberlux Corporation might want to hire a new legal strategy team—or at least set a few calendar reminders. The embattled company is at the center of lawsuits across the country, and its approach seems to consist mostly of radio silence. While Plaintiffs like Atlantic Wave Holdings and Aerotek barrel forward, Cyberlux is sitting idle, collecting court losses like trading cards.

A Texas-Sized Defeat

The most recent gut punch came in Harris County, Texas, where Atlantic Wave Holdings, LLC, and Secure Community, LLC, apparently scored a decisive win in their case to enforce a foreign judgment. After months of motions, hearings, and filings, the court finalized the case on December 31, 2024, with Atlantic Wave holding a $1.4 million ticket to collect.

Cyberlux tried its best to fight back—filing for a protective order to dodge questioning—but the court apparently shut that down faster than a bad Yelp review. The Plaintiffs didn't waste time celebrating; on January 3, 2025, they filed a request for a writ of execution.

In Texas, a writ of execution is like the legal version of sending in the repo crew. When someone refuses to pay up after a court ruling, this nifty little order gives law enforcement the green light to swoop in and seize non-exempt property—think cars, bank accounts, or other valuables. Of course, Texas law isn't heartless; your home, your cowboy boots, and a few other essentials are off-limits. But for everything else? It's fair game, making this the courtroom equivalent of "pay up, or we're taking it."

Elsewhere: Crickets

While the Texas case wraps up, Cyberlux is leaving a trail of unanswered lawsuits and dormant cases across the country. If inaction were a legal strategy, Cyberlux would be its poster child.

1. Aerotek vs. Datron and Cyberlux — North Carolina

Aerotek filed suit in Wake Superior Court on October 29, 2024, and Cyberlux's response has been nonexistent. This kind of ghosting isn't just rude; it's an open invitation for a default judgment.

2. Cyberlux vs. Atlantic Wave in Virginia

Cyberlux launched two cases against Atlantic Wave in Richmond, Virginia, but apparently decided to take a long nap afterward. No filings. No motions. No progress since July 2024. At this point, even the court docket must be getting bored. A hearing is scheduled for the end of March.

3. Richmond Original Case in January 24 Hearing

Meanwhile, in the original Richmond case, a hearing is scheduled for January 24, 2025. Adding a little spice to the docket is an unentered order basically a Schrödinger's cat of legal filings. Whether this hearing will shake Cyberlux from its stupor is anyone's guess.

4. Atlantic Wave vs. Cyberlux in San Diego Federal Court

Over in sunny California, Cyberlux's federal case with Atlantic Wave has been quiet since September 3, 2024. Four months without a filing is less strategic pause and more forgotten email draft. Meanwhile, plaintiffs have continued to provide status updates to the court.

5. RB Capital vs. Cyberlux in San Diego Federal Court

In another San Diego case, this time filed by RB Capital, Cyberlux hasn't made a peep since November 27, 2024. At this rate, the court might want to send a wellness check.

A Corporate Mystery

So, what's the deal? Is Cyberlux playing some kind of 4D legal chess, or is the company simply out of moves? The company's inertia is puzzling and risky. Ignoring lawsuits doesn't make them go away; it just makes default judgments more likely. And for a company with Plaintiffs lining up across the country, that's a very expensive gamble.

The pattern of inaction paints a picture of either strategic withdrawal, financial trouble, or sheer disorganization. Whatever the reason, Cyberlux's silence is emboldening Plaintiffs like Atlantic Wave and Aerotek, who seem more than happy to turn up the pressure.

What's Next?

The January 24 hearing in Richmond is shaping up to be a pivotal moment. Will Cyberlux finally rejoin the fight, or will the pattern of inactivity continue? Meanwhile, the writ of execution in Texas signals that Atlantic Wave is gearing up to collect whether Cyberlux likes it or not.

For now, Cyberlux's legal troubles look less like a defense strategy and more like a slow-motion trainwreck. Stay tuned this legal drama isn't done yet.
